26 June 2004—Visit:
Mountain products in the south region of Cordoba

For registration: www.euromontana.org/Cordoba-en.htm
In the year 2000, on the occasion of the Trento Convention, Euromontana promoted the comparative advantage of mountain areas and its products that are described, quite correctly, as «reservoir of diversities». However, the world economic context and also the European context tend progressively to marginalise those regions and their products that, until recently, in a pure economic logic did not appear to have their place anymore.

In fact, how much is a cheese processed according to an ancestral method worth to you? Meat produced with local endangered breeds? Herds reared in an extensive way preserving landscapes and a certain «harmony» of the flora? Or else, productions managed with respect for their environment and populations? Is it really too expensive?

An improvement of the knowledge and understanding of mountain products constitutes a strategic asset for their development and thus promotes the maintenance of a sustainable agriculture and of the rich diversity in those specific areas of the world.

Then, Euromontana decided to act, in carrying out with the help of 14 partners, a study programme on quality mountain products with the support of DG Research, from the European Commission.
On the basis of the study of 10 mountain areas products from 8 countries in Europe, this programme is aimed at identifying intrinsic characteristics of mountain products and their development strategies. From these results, useful information and tools have been developed on the Internet for groups of producers, processors cooperatives, mountain product development agencies and also for policy makers from all European countries.

In addition, Euromontana has drafted a Charter and recommendations on these results, in order to better take into account and support the particular context of mountain products in European and also national policies.

We invite you to take part in this wide debate that is the last consultation within the framework of the project but also the wider discussion on how Euromontana and its members might best promote and disseminate the proposals and findings among the policy making institutes in Europe.

The study programme: Strategic Information for the development of agricultural quality products in the European mountain areas

Since October 2002, and within the framework of its general mission for cooperation in mountain areas, Euromontana has been leading a European-wide research programme on quality mountain food products. The mission of the project is to identify successful strategies to add value to mountain food products, as part of achieving sustainable development in mountain territories.

The 14 partners of the project come from various mountain areas of 8 countries from geographical Europe: France, Greece, Italy, Norway, Poland, Rumania, Spain and UK.

The two main objectives of the programme are:

- the establishment of a Information System on mountain food products to be a valuable tool for professionals working in the mountain areas of Europe;
- the development of political proposals at European level and strategically recommendations to actors from mountain areas. The European Charter for mountain food products will also be developed.
